Capital and accumulation, $850,000.

THIS Company is one of the oldest,

and among the most prudently and successfully conducted in the country. The primary object in conducting its business has been to provide perfect security under all conceivable circumstances, for the payment of its losses, and to return to the insured the surplus at stated periods, and strict economy is observed.

Every insured person is a member of the company

and shares in the profits of the business, and is subject to no liability or expense beyond the premium. The directors are required to be peculiarly interested in the company, and they give it their personal attention; and bonds of sufficient security are given by its officers for the faithful performance of their duties. Insurance may be effected for the benefit of the wife, which is secured to her by law beyond the reach of the husband's creditors; and creditors may insure the lives of debtors.

THIS Company is one of the oldest, and among the most prudently and successfully conducted in the country. The primary object in conducting its business has been to provide perfect security under all conceivable circumstances, for the payment of its losses under its policies, and to return to the insured the surplus at stated periods, and strict economy is observed.
Every insured person is a member of the company and shares in the profits of the business, and is subject to no liability or assessments beyond his premium.
The directors are required to be peculiarly interested in the company, and they give to their personal attention, and hence of sufficient security, are given by its officers for the faithful performance of their duties. Insurance may be effected for the benefit of the wife, which is secured to her by law beyond the reach of a husband's creditors; and creditors may insure the lives of debtors.

Highly Important to Farmers.
THE ONLY EXCLUSIVE FARMERS' INSURANCE COMPANY IN THE WEST.
THE MADISON MUTUAL, LOCATED AT MADISON, WISCONSIN.

THIS Company continues to take risks upon Farm Property, including all kinds of buildings of all kinds, (belonging to farmers,) household furniture, grain in barns, live stock, &c., from one to five years, at lower rates than most other responsible companies. All losses promptly paid at the office as soon as proof is made thereon.
We believe it to be for the interest of the farmers to insure by themselves, their property being less hazardous than any other, consequently they will have no losses, and in case of loss, they will have an equal footing.
Experience has shown that two-thirds, if not three-fourths of all the fires that occur are upon stores, taverns, mills, shops and such like property. In this company all such property is rejected, resulting, by letting them alone.
Farmers, look to your own interest, and insure in a Farmers' Company.
We have been doing business a little over three years, and we have not been obliged to assess our premium notes, and for the last fourteen months we have not had a single dollar loss, though doing a large and prosperous business, which we believe to be without a parallel in the history of insurance.
The best of references given as to the responsibility of the company.

IN ITALY.
BY RAYARD TAYLOR.
"Dear Lillian, all I wish is won!
I sit beneath the olive tree,
Where olive orchards gleam and quiver
Along the banks of Arno's river.
Through laurel leaves the dim green light
Falls on my forehead as I write;
And the sweet chiming of vespers ringing,
Blend with the cantadina's singing.
Rich is the soil with fancy's gold;
The stirring memories of old
Rise thronging in my haunted vision,
And wake my spirit's young ambition.
But as the radiant sunsets close
Above Val d'Arno's bowers of rose,
My soul forgets the golden glory,
And deems our love a dream story.
Thy words in memory's ear outchime
The music of the Tuscan rhyme:
Thou stand'st here—the gentle-hearted—
Amid the shades of bards departed!
Their garlands of immortal bay
I see before me fade away,
And turn from Petrarch's passion glances
To my own dearer heart-romances.
Sad is the owl glow that fires
The midnight of the cypress spires;
And the cold scented wind that rises
The hearts of bright Etruscan roses.
The fair Italian dream I chased,
A single thought of thee effaced;
For the true child of song and sun
Lies in the heart which mine hath won!"

From the Columbian and Great West.
SKETCHES OF BORDER-LIFE.
FLEET FOOT.—A LEGEND OF KENTUCKY.

BY WILLIAM T. COGHESALL.

In 1778 Kentucky was the home of remarkable men. They were men who exceeded the Indian in cunning—who had more enduring powers of resistance to fatigue, and who were as relentless in pursuit of their red foes as were the savage red men in pursuit of white intruders upon the ancient hunting grounds of their tribes. There are Indian wigwags now toward the Rocky mountains, and on the plains sloping from the Sierra Nevada, and there are white men, who dare wrap themselves in their blankets and go to rest alone in the forest—who are brave and hardy and who know from severe experience the trials and fatigues of a hunter's life, but there are none who may be selected as fair representatives of the hunters of Kentucky. The fatigues, the dangers and perils of a Rocky mountain life, now-a-days, do not equal those which surrounded the pioneer from Virginia, in 1778. Among the most exciting traditions of the times of trials to the pioneers in the great valley of the west, those belonging to Kentucky have pre-eminent interest. Her pioneers had to teach a horde of desperate Indians, not before disturbed, that they must retreat from the valley or the hill-side where the white man chose to build his cabin. Bold and brave, stout and determined men alone, were fitted to carry the rifle and swing the axe in the forests to be felled, in 1778 for the cabin and the corn field. Our legend is about such men. Two of them were in the depths of a dense forest on a certain morning, when, though the earlier harbingers of dawn had given place to rosy tints, which glowed upon hill-tops touching the eastern horizon, it was so dark in the wooded valleys that the hunters with difficulty groped their way. They had not traveled all night, but they had gathered up their blankets when it was yet an hour before daybreak, and were picking their way along slowly—knowing that soon the morning light would break through the thick foliage over them. They had been absent from the fort, at Harrodsburg, several days; they knew there was anxiety about their fate and they were impatient to relieve it. It was not light enough for them to see distinctly, when their quick ears detected a footstep stealthily approaching. In an instant each had chosen his ambush and was keenly watchful. "By power, its old Martin," cried one of the hunters, and springing from his ambush, he drew his rifle to his shoulder and leveled it at thus indicated, who gave a sudden yell, and then, in a rough tone said: "Put down your shootin' iron. I ain't fond of such notions, ef they are in fun. Whar's Mace?" "Ready to pop you ef you had been a red skin," answered the individual called for, showing himself. "Well I've got a little news for you in particular, but may-be Fleet Foot'll take a sort 'o notion to it too. Sit down on this 'ere log, till I tell you, for it's a little serious and I'm kinder worked up about it." The three hunters sat together in earnest conversation until the sun shone broadly on the tree tops, and checkered shadows lay all around them on the fallen leaves. Old Martin, after reminding the others that he had gone away from the fort at Harrodsburg the day before they left, informed them that he had been working about ten miles distant, where some friends were making a settlement. Mace's sister had gone with him as company for his wife. Four men were at work in the woods, when they heard screams at the cabin. They rushed toward it. Martha's son, one of the four, was shot by an Indian, whom old Martha saw and attacked, while the others continued toward the cabin. "I put a ball in that red skin who shot Bob," said old Martin, talking to Mace and Fleet Foot, "and then I run for the cabin too. I didn't hear or see any sign of any more Indians, and when I got to the cabin I found the women were gone. I swore a leetle and cursed the Indians right smart but poor Bob was in the woods and we had to look arter him. So we went, sneakin', and found him dead enough and we carried him to the cabin and then held a counsel. I swore I'd go to the fort and git a party, and follow them red skins till we had our women and their scalps ef it took till snow come. We discussed a while, and the other boys agreed to get on the Injin's trail and make signs, and I started for the fort. It was just about sundown, and soon it got dark and I was leetle excited and I got a leetle wrong, and I've been a wanderin' and just beginnin' to get the right bearings when I saw Fleet Foot a drawin' a sight on me. I was tarnation lucky." Fleet Foot and his companion had listened attentively while Martin related the particulars of the attack, and when he had concluded, Fleet Foot said: "Did you notice what sort of varmint that was you did the business for?" "I couldn't just exactly tell, 'cause I hadn't me, but I believe he was a Blackfish," answered Martin. "We can catch 'em then," said Fleet Foot, "I know them varmints. You know what the old chief told Boone—that I beat all his warriors on a fair race last summer, and he was the old 'un who gave me my nick name. Ef I could beat his fastest red devils then, and as I did when I had to creep into the fort, when Mac's brother was shot this summer, Mac and I can overtake the varmints now, and we will. We've got a lot of accounts to settle with 'em and now's the time. We'd chase 'em ef they hadn't no women; but, by powder, we'll have them women ef they haven't scalped 'em, and ef they have there shall be one old Blackfish left in Kaintuck. Now, old man, you go right on straight to the fort and get five or six hunters and send 'em on arter us, and we'll go right off to your cabin and show night we'll overtake them Ingins, and may-be afore your boys get up with us we'll do the business. Tell 'em at the fort that our blood is up, and the sights on our rifles are itching to be drawn on them Blackfish." "That's a fact," cried Mac, "they know us and they can just calculate that we'll stretch a few of these rascals ef we get a chance, or they'll do our business for us right quick. They got one of our folks and that's as many as we mean to let 'em have—Kate shall be rescued or avenged, anyhow we'll give 'em ten to one for cutting off Harry and Bob." The hunters separated without formality; old Martin hastening with all his energy to execute his mission, and Mac and Fleet Foot struck a bee-line for the cabin. Fleet Foot had an interest in the success of the enterprise about which he did not speak. It was venturesome for two hunters to start from the cabin on the night previous, to follow, they knew not how many Indians, but they only went as spies. It was much more venturesome—much more desperate for Fleet Foot and his companion to undertake what they threatened. They went not only as spies; unless the party of Indians was very large they determined to rescue the women, if they were alive—if not to avenge their massacre terribly. Both were daring and experienced hunters. Fleet Foot was one of the bravest and shrewdest of Kentucky pioneers. He was young, but athletic, watchful and quick at expedients, besides he possessed extraordinary fleetness. No Indian could out-run him. He had had several opportunities of testing his powers as a runner in saving his own and others lives. He alluded to some of them in his conversation with old Martin. On one occasion he was chopping with his brother and another pioneer, about four miles from the fort, when a large party of Indians led by the renowned chief Blackfish, suddenly attacked them—shot Fleet Foot's brother and took the other chopper prisoner. Fleet Foot dashed through the woods at the top of his speed, with half a dozen warriors straining every muscle to overtake him. It was their design to attack the fort. They were eagerly anxious to prevent an alarm being given, but the young hunter was too fleet for them all. He reached the fort in safety, and the garrison prepared at once to meet their foe. When the Indians made the attack they were repelled with considerable loss. On another occasion Fleet Foot was shooting at a mark near the fort with a brother of his present companion. They were suddenly surrounded by Indians. The other marksmen were shot. Balls aimed at Fleet Foot missed him. He ran with his energy toward the fort, several Indians in full chase after him—others firing at him. He was within seven paces of the fort when he saw that the door was not open. In an instant the thought struck him that it dare not be opened for fear of the Indians would rush in. He threw himself flat on the ground between a large stump and the fort. There were numerous guns aimed at the Indians from the fort, and they dare not come within range of the balls. They amused themselves by firing at Fleet Foot. There he lay, his mother looking down upon him and praying that he might be saved—his friends urging him to lie close and not lose courage—while the balls of the savage warriors, thirsting for his blood, were striking close to him, often throwing upon him the dirt which they plowed up. It was a most perilous and painful position. He conversed with his friends about opening the door of the fort. He said he could rush through it in an instant. They answered him that they dare not risk the lives of the women and children. The Indians might reach the door before it could be securely fastened again. There were not men enough in the fort to fight the large body of Indians in close combat. The balls from the rifles of the Indians continued to strike around him. A moment the young hunter was engaged in deep thought—then he cried: "For God's sake dig a hole under the fort and I'll creep through it." Immediately his request was complied with and the brave hunter reached this curious avenue to safety without injury, and was caught in his mother's arms and wept over as one rescued who had been given up as lost. The baffled Indians retired with savage yells. When Fleet Foot and companion reached the cabin they had no difficulty in finding the "signs" made by the hunters who had followed the Indians as spies. They pushed forward on the trail with the speed which only experienced hunters could attain. It was yet early in the day when old Martin showed a party of five hunters where he had killed the Indian who shot his son Bob. This party immediately followed in pursuit of Fleet Foot and Mac. It was between mid-day and sun-down when Fleet Foot declared that the Indians could not be much in advance, and he and Mac began to calculate what they should do when the savages were overtaken. They conversed a few minutes when Fleet Foot said: "It's no use—we don't know how we'll find 'em. I'll be time to fix how we shall give it to 'em when we've got a sight of the varmints." Again the hunters pushed forward zealously. They had not yet met the two hunters who left the cabin the night previous. They began to have serious surmises about their fate. As they hastened on they frequently conversed in low tones about their fore-runners. Lengthened shadows were creeping in the forest, indicating that soon it would be impossible for the hunters to keep trace of the signs which had been left during the day. Fleet Foot observed a small piece of linen on a bush. He grasped eagerly, showing it to Mac, said: "That's leetle encouraging. It shows the women are yet alive anyhow; but its tarnation strange we haven't ketchted them other boys. I believe they've been a leetle careless and the Ingins have got 'em." He had gone but a few steps after he made these remarks when Fleet Foot cried: "Just as I expected. Here's one of 'em anyhow. Them Ingins 'll roast the other, by powder, ef we don't get 'em out of their hands." "That they will," answered Mac, who looked upon the dead body of a hunter, with whom he had been well acquainted, lying directly in their path. He had been shot and his scalp taken. "Last year old Blackfish said he'd roast the first hunter he could get into his camp, and if they've got the other fellow a prisoner, I'll bet they mean to give him a taste of what we give young pigs on Christmas, but we won't let 'em, by powder, as you say, Fleet Foot." "By no powder, we won't," cried Fleet Foot. The hunters did not stand over the body of their dead friend even long enough for this conversation. Their duties to the living were too pressing. They talked cautiously as they proceeded. Experienced as they were in detecting Indian "signs," they knew that the savages could not be far in advance, and they hoped to overtake them before it was dark. While the hunters were hastening in the pursuit under this impression, the Indians were encamped upon a small stream, in a spot which afforded no particular advantages to them in case of an attack. It was late in the afternoon when the female prisoners, from over fatigue, began to grow tardy in their march. Both fell behind the main party of savages and were guarded by a brawny warrior who delighted in tormenting them. The spies on their trail came in sight of the women and this warrior, who, with an Indian boy was at that moment, all the savages in sight, and supposing this to be the whole of the party, with a reckless impulse rushed to the attack. They saw their error too late. The brawny warrior was severely wounded by a ball from the rifle of one of the hunters but no sooner had the report of his gun rung through the woods than the hunters were surrounded. One was shot and scalped; the other taken prisoner. While Fleet Foot and his companions were groping their way by starlight, the Indians were holding a council upon the fate of their prisoners. The spies had found much difficulty in tracing the path of the Indians, but they left behind them such signs as clearly indicated to their followers, the path to be pursued. The savages had pushed forward with much speed and caution till they had been attacked; when, supposing that all in their pursuit had been removed from a watch over their movement, they relaxed their speed, and soon encamped, losing the aid of the forerunners, from the time they left the corpse of their keenest powers, in order to keep the Indian trail. Twilight was gone, and though the hunters could clearly see the leaves on the tree-tops, it had become quite dark around their path. They were about to seek a camping place, and give over the pursuit till another day dawned, when Fleet Foot stooping forward, looked for several moments intently through the thickening gloom, then he whispered to Mac. "Somebody's makin' a little fire out yonder about a mile, and I'll bet my ammunition it's them tarnation varmints." The fire grew brighter; Mac saw it distinctly. The hunters slowly and stealthily turned their footsteps toward the feeble flame. It became more distinct, until at length they could see its smoke curling among the leaves of the trees under which it snapped and glowed. A dark form stood between the fire and the hunters; they recognized the outline to be that of an Indian; creeping onward with cat-like caution, both grasped their rifles closer, and put their left hands on their hunting knives. They were impatient to know where the prisoners were, and what was the strength of the Indian party. At length the fire blazed so brightly that it illuminated three forms which the hunters, with great joy, recognized as those of the women and the captured spy; but with all their skill and all their caution the hunters could not ascertain the number of savages. An old Indian came to the fire and lit his pipe; another roasted a piece of meat, and both joined a party at such a distance from the fire that Fleet Foot was puzzled to tell how many foes he must fight before the prisoners could be rescued. He longed to shoot the "varmints," who exposed themselves at the fire, but prudence forbade him. He instructed Mac to keep his place and watch closely while he went round the camp and reconnoitered. Watchfully and noiselessly he stole through the woods, till the Indian council was between him and the fire; then he could count the number of Indians in council, but he was not satisfied to know only what strength guarded the prisoners; he desired to communicate to them the cheering news that they had friends as well as foes around them. With this intention he continued his noiseless course until he stood within a few feet of the prisoners. The young woman was nearest him. He whispered her name. She did not hear him, or if she heard, conceived the voice to be one of her active imagination had conjured. Again Fleet Foot whispered that name which was dear to him, and fell sweetly from his lips. The young woman started and looked about her. An Indian on the watch, saw her startled movement, and came near her. The fire shone brightly on him; Fleet Foot was sorely tempted to shoot him, but the risk was too great. The bold hunter's portion was one of great trial. Another word from him might alarm the young woman, and her agitation defeat the whole scheme of rescue. Shielded from the view of the Indians by a large tree, Fleet Foot crept nearer the prisoners. He was rejoiced to see the Indian whose suspicions had been excited, return among his companions and take his seat in the council. Fleet Foot was now within a few feet of the prisoners—he saw them as distinctly as if it were daylight, and he could see, seated upon the ground not many yards beyond the prisoners, a little body of desperate savages, apparently consulting about the fate of the three pale faces, towards whom, the full light of a bright fire blazing on them, more than one Indian eye was continually cast. Again Fleet Foot whispered. To his great joy he saw that the young woman heard and recognized a friendly voice, but having been warned by the conduct of the savage watching her, was shrewd enough to make no movement that would again arouse his suspicion. She dare not answer the voice, and Fleet Foot was left to conjecture whether she knew if it was he so near her—he would have run many risks to have known how wildly her heart beat, for it told her that he who was risking so much for her sake could be none other than Fleet Foot. The hunter was determined not to be in doubt as to whether she knew him, and he whispered: "I am Fleet Foot and Mac's not far off; and old Martin's comin' with a party of sharpshooters, and afore morning we'll give them varmints what'll keep 'em from killin' any more white folks, or stealin' any more women. When you get a chance, whisper to the old woman, and tell her not to go to sleep, and tell that chap tied up near her to be on the look out for a fight." The young woman dropped her head as if it had fallen upon her breast with a nod in sleep, and Fleet Foot understood that his message and warning were distinctly known. To be concluded.

CHEAPER PAPER.—ANOTHER INVENTION.—The Long Island Indicator of last week says: Mr. Samuel Nolan, late of the city of Dublin, Ireland, now resident in New York, with the assistance of his brother-in-law, Dr. Antisel, has invented and patented a paper making machine and pulp that meets all the difficulty. Dr. Antisel, whose chemical knowledge is so universally known and prized, has invented a pulp, which in its raw state will cost more than about four cents per lb., and by the aid of the machine invented by Mr. Nolan, can be brought into market, made into paper, at a cost of about four cents per lb. Paper at present costs about sixteen cents, so that the value of the invention can at once be seen. The material from which the pulp is manufactured will flourish and grow abundantly in ground that is at present useless to the farmer, and here, too, the community will be the gainers. We have seen and examined specimens of the pulp, and have no hesitation in pronouncing it just the thing wanted. It is as white and clear as the most clearly bleached cotton, and is capable of the most delicate tint. The harshness and transparency of the straw paper is not to be found on it, while it is capable of the highest finish, maintaining all the pliancy and toughness of pure linen rags. In connection with this subject we will say more in a few days, and by a few simple calculations endeavor to show that Messrs. Nolan and Antisel are real benefactors to their race. We hope they will reap the rich reward such mastery of mind over matter deserves.

MR. BOOTH AGAIN ARRESTED.—Mr. Booth was arrested and imprisoned day before yesterday on a bench warrant from the U. S. district court, to answer to the indictment found against him in that court. A statement made by Mr. Booth as to a refusal by Judge Miller to accept Dr. Wunderly as his bail is contradicted in some particulars by the clerk of the court, a son of Judge Miller. Mr. Paine, counsel for Mr. Booth, left Milwaukee in the evening, to make application to the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus.

The storms of Wednesday and Thursday nights were very severe, and it is likely, have done a vast amount of injury to the crops.—Wheat is beaten down badly, and the labor of harvesting it will be greatly increased, if indeed it is not in many instances rendered worthless. Oats are still worse. They are so badly tangled and twisted about as to make it next to impossible to cut them. Whether the corn has been injured we are not advised, but it hardly seems as though it could stand well against such heavy wind. Thus the prospect which but a short time ago was so very cheering, is suddenly changed. A few days of fair weather may bring about a better look, but it is now far enough from encouraging.

We understand that the locusts have done much more damage in the vicinity of Rockford than in this section. They puncture small limbs of trees for the purpose of depositing their eggs; every such limb dies and falls to the ground. Young orchards are seriously injured, some possibly ruined, and the foliage upon forest trees, particularly the oak presents the appearance of having been injured by the fire. Many stories are in circulation of the poisonous effects of their bite upon the human system, producing in some instances death. Of their truth we were not able to learn. Several families that resided at Rockford seventeen years ago, speak of their appearance that season in greater numbers than this. Hoping they may not make their appearance again, we commit their history and destiny to the naturalist.

Nevada, in Green county, whose postmaster wants somebody to come there and establish "a reliable democratic paper," is a flourishing settlement of one log house in the woods, half way between Decatur and Monroe. The worthy official is doubtless ready to pledge the whole neighborhood as subscribers, provided his own paper should be thrown in for services rendered.

ROCKFORD FEMALE SEMINARY.—The anniversary exercises of this flourishing institution, were held on Thursday of last week at Rockford, in presence of a large and deeply interested audience. A class of six young ladies graduated and received the usual diplomas. The compositions of each of the graduating class evinced scholarship and moral worth. An excellent address was delivered on the occasion by Prof. Emerson, of Beloit college. There have been in attendance during the year as pupils, two hundred and fifty-six young ladies. It is an institution of which the north-west has reason to be proud, and owes its present high position very much to the untiring labors and self-denial of its principal, Miss Sill.

SUPREME COURT DECISION.—The Milwaukee papers publish the opinion of chief justice Whiton in the case of Mr. Booth. It would occupy nearly a page of our daily paper, and is pronounced by all who heard or have read it a very able argument, while many consider it incontrovertible. Of the decision of the court, the Free Democrat says: Judge Crawford affirmed the opinion of the court so far as our discharge on defectiveness of the warrant was concerned, and also the power of the state courts to enforce the writ of habeas corpus against officers of the U. S., but sustained the constitutionality of the fugitive act. Judge Smith gave an able verbal opinion, affirming his former opinion and reviewing some other important points. A friend who lately visited St. Paul, Minnesota, seeking a location, says the immigration to that region is tremendous, and that property is held at almost fabulous prices, $1,000 per acre being demanded for land in the vicinity of St. Paul. Our friend concluded that it was no place for him, and returned to this section, confident that he could do better here with what money he had.—Kenosha Telegraph.

New England Mutual Life Ins., Of Boston, Mass., Chartered in 1843, Capital and accumulation, $650,000.

THIS Company is one of the oldest, and among the most prudently and successfully conducted in the country. The primary object in conducting its business has been to provide perfect security under all conceivable circumstances, for the payment of its losses under its policies, and to return to the insured the surplus at stated periods, and strict economy is observed.

Every insured person is a member of the company and shares in the profits of the business, and is subject to no liability or assessments beyond his premium.

The directors are required to be peculiarly interested in the company, and they give their personal attention; and bonds of sufficient security are given by its officers for the faithful performance of their duties.

Insurance may be effected for the benefit of the wife, which is secured to her by law beyond the reach of a husband's creditors; and creditors may insure the lives of debtors.

Highly Important to Farmers, THE ONLY EXCLUSIVE FARMERS' INSURANCE COMPANY IN THE WEST.

THE MADISON MUTUAL, LOCATED AT MADISON, WISCONSIN.

THIS Company continues to take risks upon 1. Farm Property only, consisting of buildings of all kinds, belonging to farmers, household furniture, grain in barns, live stock, &c., from one to five years at lower rates than most other responsible companies.

All losses promptly paid at the office as soon as proof is made thereon.

We believe it to be for the interest of the farmers to insure by themselves, their property being less hazardous than any other, consequently you will have no loss only your own of the same class, and all will be on an equal footing.

Experience has shown that two-thirds, if not three-fourths of all the fires that occur are upon stores, taverns and such places, and in this class of fires, many all such property is rejected positively, by letting them alone.

Farmers, look to your own interest, and insure in a Farmers' Company.

We have been doing business a little over three years, and we have not been obliged to assess our premium notes, and for the last eighteen months we have not had a single dollar loss, though doing a large and prosperous business, which we believe to be without a parallel in the history of insurance.

IN ITALY.
BY BAYARD TAYLOR.
"Dear Lillian, all I wished is won!
I sit beneath Italia's sun,
Where olive orchards gleam and quiver
Along the banks of Arno's river.
Through laurel leaves the dim green light
Falls on my forehead as I write;
And the sweet chiming of vespers ringing,
Blend with the cantadina's singing.
Rich is the soil with fancy's gold;
The stirring memories of old
Rise thronging in my haunted vision,
And wake my spirit's young ambition.
But as the radiant sunsets close
Above Val d'Arno's bowers of rose,
My soul forgets the olden glory,
And deems our love a dearer story.
Thy words to memory's ear outreach
The music of the Tuscan rhyme;
Thou stand'st here, the genius startled—
Amid the shades of bardic departed!
Their garlands of immortal bay
I see before the poet's airy,
And turn from Petrarch's passion glances
To my own dear heart-romances.
Sad is the opal glow that dyes
The midnight of the cypress spire;
And the cold scented wind that blows
The hearts of bright Etruscan roses.
The fair Italian dream I chased,
A single thought of thee effaced;
For the true heart which mine hath won!
Lies in the heart which mine hath won!"

From the Columbian and Great West.
SKETCHES OF BORDER-LIFE.

FLEET FOOT.—A LEGEND OF KENTUCKY.

BY WILLIAM T. CROGHAN.

In 1778 Kentucky was the home of remarkable men. They were men who exceeded the Indian in cunning—who had more enduring powers of resistance to fatigue, and who were as relentless in pursuit of their red foes as were the savage red men in pursuit of white intruders upon the ancient hunting grounds of their tribes. There are Indian wigwags now toward the Rocky mountains, and on the plains sloping from the Sierra Nevada, and there are white men, who dare wrap themselves in their blankets and go to rest alone in the forest—who are brave and hardy and who know from severe experience the trials and fatigues of a hunter's life, but there are none who may be selected as fair representatives of the hunters of Kentucky. The fatigues, the dangers and perils of a Rocky mountain life, now-a-days, do not equal those which surrounded the pioneer from Virginia, in 1778. Among the most exciting traditions of the times of trials to the pioneers in the great valley of the west, those belonging to Kentucky have pre-eminent interest. Her pioneers had to teach a hodge of desperate Indians, not before disturbed, that they must retreat from the valley or the hill-side where the white man chose to build his cabin. Bold and brave, stout and determined men alone, were fitted to carry the rifle and swing the axe in the forests to be felled, in 1778 for the cabin and the corn field. Our legend is about such men. Two of them were in the depths of a dense forest on a certain morning, when, though the earlier harbingers of dawn had given place to roseate tints, which glowed upon hill-tops touching the eastern horizon, it was so dark in the wooded valleys that the hunters with difficulty groped their way. They had not traveled all night, but they had gathered up their blankets when it was yet an hour before daybreak, and were picking their way along slowly—knowing that soon the morning light would break through the thick foliage over them. They had been absent from the fort, at Harrodsburgh, several days; they knew there was anxiety about their fate and they were impatient to relieve it. It was not light enough for them to see distinctly, when their quick ears detected a footstep stealthily approaching. In an instant each had chosen his ambush and was keenly watchful. "By power, its old Martin," cried one of the hunters, and springing from his ambush, he drew his rifle to his shoulder and leveled it at thus indicated, who gave a sudden yell, and then, in a rough tone said: "Put down your shootin' iron. I aint fond of such notions, ef they are in fun. Whar's Mace?" "Ready to pop you ef you had been a red skin," answered the individual called for, showing himself. "Well I've got a little news for you in particular, but may be Fleet Foot 'll take a sort o' notion to it too. Sit down on this 'ere log till I tell you, for its a little serious and I'm kinder worked up about it." The three hunters sat together in earnest conversation until the sun shone broadly on the tree tops, and checkered shadows lay all around them on the fallen leaves. Old Martin, after reminding the others that he had gone away from the fort at Harrodsburgh the day before they left, informed them that he had been working about ten miles distant, where some friends were making a settlement. Mace's sister had gone with him as company for his wife. Four men were at work in the woods, when they heard screams at the cabin. They rushed toward it. Martin's son, one of the four, was shot by an Indian, whom old Martin saw and attacked, while the others continued toward the cabin. "I put a ball in that red skin who shot Bob," said old Martin, talking to Mace and Fleet Foot, "and then I run for the cabin too. I didn't hear or see any sign of any more Indians, and when I got to the cabin I found the women were gone. I swore a leetle and cursed the Indians right smart but poor Bob was in the woods and we had to look after him. So we went, sneakin', and found him dead enough and we carried him to the cabin and then held a counsel. I swore I'd go to the fort and git a party, and foler them red skins till we had our women and their scalps of it took till snow come. We discussed a while, and the other boys agreed to get on the Indian's trail and make signs, and I started for the fort. It was just about sundown, and soon it got dark and I was leetle excited and I got a leetle wrong, and I've been a wanderin' and just beginnin' to get the right bearings when I saw Fleet Foot a drawin' a sight on me. I was tarnation lucky." Fleet Foot and his companion had listened attentively while Martin related the particulars of the attack, and when he had concluded, Fleet Foot said: "Did you notice what sort of varmint that was you did the business for?" "I couldn't tell exactly tell, 'cause I hadn't me, but I b'lieve he was a Blackfish," answered Martin. "We can catch 'em then," said Fleet Foot, "I know them varmints. You know what the old chief told Boone—that I beat all his warriors on a fair race last summer, and he was the old 'un who gave me my nick name. Ef I could beat his fastest red devils then, and as I did when I had to creep into the fort, when Mace's brother was shot this summer, Mace and I can overtake the varmints now, and we will. We've got a lot of accounts to settle with 'em and now's the time. We'd chase 'em ef they hadn't no women; but, by powder, we'll have them women ef they haven't scalps 'em, and ef they have there shan't be one old Blackfish left in Kaintuck."

Now, old man, you go right on straight to the fort and get five or six hunters and send 'em on arter us, and we'll go right off to your cabin and afore night we'll overtake them Ingins, and may be afore your boys get up with us we'll do the business. Tell 'em at the fort that our blood is up, and the sights on our rifles are itching to be drawn on them Blackfish." "That's fact," cried Mace, "they know us and they can just calculate that we'll stretch a few of these rascals ef we got a chance, or they'll do our business for us right quick. They got one of my folks and that's as many as we mean to let 'em have—Kate shall be rescued or avenged, anyhow we'll give 'em ten to one for cutting off Harry and Bob." The hunters separated without formality; old Martin hastening with all his energy to execute his mission, and Mace and Fleet Foot struck a bee-line for the cabin. Fleet Foot had an interest in the success of the enterprise about which he did not speak. It was venturesome for two hunters to start from the cabin on the night previous, to follow, they knew not how many Indians, but they only went as spies. It was much more venturesome—much more desperate for Fleet Foot and his companion to undertake what they threatened. They went not only as spies; unless the party of Indians was very large they determined to rescue the women, if they were alive—if not to avenge their massacre terribly. Both were during and experienced hunters. Fleet Foot was one of the bravest and shrewdest of Kentucky pioneers. He was young, but athletic, watchful and quick at expedients, besides he possessed extraordinary fleetness. No Indian could out-run him. He had had several opportunities of testing his powers as a runner in saving his own and others lives. He alluded to some of them in his conversation with old Martin. On one occasion he was chopping with his brother and another pioneer, about four miles from the fort, when a large party of Indians led by the renowned chief Blackfish, suddenly attacked them—shot Fleet Foot's brother and took the other chopper prisoner. Fleet Foot dashed through the woods at the top of his speed, with half a dozen warriors straining every muscle to overtake him. It was their design to attack the fort. They were eagerly anxious to prevent an alarm being given, but the young hunter was too fleet for them all. He reached the fort in safety, and the garrison prepared at once to meet their foe. When the Indians made the attack they were repelled with considerable loss. On another occasion Fleet Foot was shooting at a mark near the fort with a brother of his present companion. They were suddenly surrounded by Indians. The other marksman was shot. Balls aimed at Fleet Foot missed him. He ran with his energy toward the fort, several Indians in full chase after him—others firing at him. He was within seven paces of the fort when he saw that the door was not open. In an instant the thought struck him that it dare not be opened for fear of the Indians would rush in. He threw himself flat on the ground between a large stump and the fort. There were numerous guns aimed at the Indians from the fort, and they dare not come within reach of the balls. They amused themselves by firing at Fleet Foot. There he lay, his mother looking down upon him and praying that he might be saved—his friends urging him to lie close and not lose courage—while the balls of the savage warriors, thirsting for his blood, were striking close to him, often throwing upon him the dirt which they plowed up. It was a most perilous and painful position. He conversed with his friends about opening the door of the fort. He said he could rush through it in an instant. They answered him that they dare not risk the lives of the women and children. The Indians might reach the door before it could be securely fastened again. There were not men enough in the fort to fight the large body of Indians in close combat. The balls from the rifles of the Indians continued to strike around him. A moment the young hunter was engaged in deep thought—then he cried: "For God's sake dig a hole under the fort and I'll creep through it." Immediately his request was complied with, and the brave hunter reached this curious avenue to safety without injury, and was caught in his mother's arms and wept over as one rescued who had been given up as lost. The baffled Indians retired with savage yells. When Fleet Foot and companion reached the cabin they had no difficulty in finding the "signs" made by the hunters who had followed the Indians as spies. They pushed forward on the trail with the speed which only experienced hunters could attain. It was yet early in the day when old Martin showed a party of five hunters where he had killed the Indian who shot his son Bob. This party immediately followed in pursuit of Fleet Foot and Mace. It was between mid-day and sun-down when Fleet Foot declared that the Indians could not be much in advance, and he and Mace began to calculate what they should do when the savages were overtaken. They conversed a few minutes when Fleet Foot said: "It's no use—we don't know how we'll find 'em. It'll be time to fix how we shall give it to 'em when we've got a sight of the varmints." Again the hunters pushed forward zealously. They had not yet met the two hunters who left the cabin the night previous. They began to have serious surmises about their fate. As they hastened on they frequently conversed in low tones about their fore-runners. Lengthened shadows were creeping in the forest, indicating that soon it would be impossible for the hunters to keep trace of the signs which had been left during the day. Fleet Foot observed a small piece of linen on a bush. He grasped eagerly, showing it to Mace, said: "That's leetle encouraging. It shows the women are yet alive anyhow; but its tarnation strange we havn't ketchid them other boys. I believe they've been a leetle careless and the Ingins have got 'em." He had gone but a few steps after he made these remarks when Fleet Foot cried: "Just as I expected. Here's one of 'em anyhow. Them Ingins 'll roast the other, by powder, ef we dont get 'em out of their hands." "That they will," answered Mace, who looked upon the dead body of a hunter, with whom he had been well acquainted, lying directly in their path. He had been shot and his scalp taken. "Last year old Blackfish said he'd roast the first hunter he could get into his camp, and ef they've got the other fellow a prisoner, I'll bet they mean to give him a taste of what we give young pigs on Christmas, but we won't let 'em, by powder, as you say, Fleet Foot." "No by powder, we won't," cried Fleet Foot. The hunters did not stand over the body of their dead friend even long enough for this conversation. Their duties to the living were too pressing. They talked cautiously as they proceeded. Experienced as they were in detecting Indian "signs," they knew that the savages could not be far in advance, and they hoped to overtake them before it was dark. While the hunters were hastening in the pursuit under this impression, the Indians were encamped upon a small stream, in a spot which afforded no particular advantages to them in case of an attack. It was late in the afternoon when the female prisoners, from over-fatigue, began to grow tardy in their march. Both fell behind the main party of savages and were guarded by a brawny warrior who delighted in tormenting them. The spies on their trail came to sight of the women and this warrior, who, with an Indian boy was, at that moment, all the savages in sight, and supposing this to be the whole of the party, with a reckless impulse rushed to the attack. They saw their error too late. The brawny warrior was severely wounded by a ball from the rifle of one of the hunters but no sooner had the report of his gun rung through the woods than the hunters were surrounded. One was shot and scalped; the other taken prisoner. While Fleet Foot and his companions were groping their way by starlight, the Indians were holding a council upon the fate of their prisoners. The spies had found much difficulty in tracing the path of the Indians, but they left behind them such signs as clearly indicated to their followers, the path to be pursued. The savages had pushed forward with much speed and caution till they had been attacked; when, supposing that all in their pursuit had been removed from a watch over their movement, they relaxed their speed, and soon encamped, losing the aid of the forerunners, from the time they left the corpse of their keenest powers, in order to keep the Indian trail. Twilight was gone, and though the hunters could clearly see the leaves on the tree-tops, it had become quite dark around their path. They were about to seek a camping place, and give over the pursuit till another day dawned, when Fleet Foot stooping forward, looked for several moments intently through the thickening fog, then he whispered to Mace: "Somebody's makin' a little fire out yonder about a mile, and I'll bet my ammunition it's them tarnation varmints." The fire grew brighter; Mace saw it distinctly. The hunters slowly and stealthily turned their footsteps toward the feeble flame. It became more distinct, until at length they could see its smoke curling among the leaves of the trees under which it snapped and glowed. A dark form stood between the fire and the hunters; they recognized the outline to be that of an Indian; creeping onward with cat-like caution, both grasped their rifles closer, and put their left hands on their hunting knives. They were impatient to know where the prisoners were and what was the strength of the Indian party. At length the fire blazed so brightly that it illuminated three forms which the hunters, with great joy, recognized as those of the women and the captured spy; but with all their skill and all their caution the hunters could not ascertain the number of savages. An old Indian came to the fire and lit his pipe; another roasted a piece of meat, and both joined a party at such a distance from the fire that Fleet Foot was puzzled to tell how many foes he must fight before the prisoners could be rescued. He longed to shoot the "varmints," who exposed themselves at the fire, but prudence forbade him. He instructed Mace to keep his place and watch closely while he went round the camp and reconnoitered. Watchfully and noiselessly he stole through the woods, till the Indian council was between him and the fire; then he could count the number of Indians in council, but he was not satisfied to know only what strength guarded the prisoners; he desired to communicate to the cheering news that they had friends as well as foes around them. With this intention he continued his noiseless course until he stood within a few feet of the prisoners. The young woman was nearest him. He whispered her name. She did not hear him, or if she heard, conceived the voice to be one of her active imagination had conjured. Again Fleet Foot whispered that name which was dear to him, and fell sweetly from his lips. The young woman started and looked about her. An Indian on the watch, saw her startled movement, and came near her. The fire shone brightly on him; Fleet Foot was sorely tempted to shoot him, but the risk was too great. The bold hunter's portion was one of great trial. Another word from him might alarm the young woman, and her agitation defeat the whole scheme of rescue. Shielded from the view of the Indians by a large tree, Fleet Foot crept nearer the prisoners. He was rejoiced to see the Indian whose companions had been excited, return among his companions and take his seat in the council. Fleet Foot was now within a few feet of the prisoners—he saw them as distinctly as if it were daylight, and he could see, seated upon the ground not many yards beyond the prisoners, a little body of desperate savages, apparently consulting about the fate of the three pale faces, towards whom the full light of a bright fire blazing on them, more than one Indian eye was continually cast. Again Fleet Foot whispered. To his great joy he saw that the young woman heard and recognized a friendly voice, but having been warned by the conduct of the savage watching her, was shrewd enough to make no movement that would again arouse his suspicions. She dare not answer the voice, and Fleet Foot was left to conjecture whether she knew if it was he so near her—he would have run many risks to have known how wildly her heart beat, for it told her that he who was risking so much for her sake could be none other than Fleet Foot. The hunter was determined not to be in doubt as to whether she knew him, and he whispered: "I am Fleet Foot and Mace's not far off; and old Martin's comin' with a party of sharpshooters, and afore morning we'll give them varmints what'll keep 'em from killin' any more white folks, or stealin' any more women. When you get a chance, whisper to the old woman, and tell her not to go to sleep, and tell that chimp tied up near her to be on the look out for a fight." The young woman dropped her head as if it had fallen upon her breast with a nod in sleep, and Fleet Foot understood that his message and warning were distinctly known. To be concluded.

THE DAILY GAZETTE.
SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 22, 1854.
MR. BOOTH AGAIN ARRESTED.—Mr. Booth was arrested and imprisoned day before yesterday on a bench warrant from the U. S. district court, to answer to the indictment found against him in that court. A statement made by Mr. Booth as to a refusal by Judge Miller to accept Dr. Wunderly as his bail is contradicted in some particulars by the clerk of the court, a son of Judge Miller. Mr. Paine, counsel for Mr. Booth, left Milwaukee in the evening, to make application to the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus.
The storms of Wednesday and Thursday nights were very severe, and it is likely, have done a vast amount of injury to the crops.—Wheat is beaten down badly, and the labor of harvesting it will be greatly increased, if indeed it is not in many instances rendered worthless. Oats are still worse. They are so badly tangled and twisted about as to make it next to impossible to cut them. Whether the corn has been injured we are not advised, but it hardly seems as though it could stand well against such heavy wind. Thus the prospect which but a short time ago was so very cheering, is suddenly changed. A few days of fair weather may bring about a better look, but it is now far enough from encouraging.
We understand that the locusts have done much more damage in the vicinity of Rockford than in this section. They puncture small limbs of trees for the purpose of depositing their eggs; every such limb dies and falls to the ground. Young orchards are seriously injured, some possibly ruined, and the foliage upon forest trees, particularly the oak presents the appearance of having been injured by the fire. Many stories are in circulation of the poisonous effects of their bite upon the human system, producing in some instances death. Of their truth we were not able to learn. Several families that resided at Rockford seventeen years ago, speak of their appearance that season in greater numbers than this. Hoping they may not make their appearance again, we commit their history and destiny to the naturalist.
NEW FLOUR.—Trusdell has for sale at his mill flour from new winter wheat.
RAILROAD COLLISION.—Two freight trains came into collision on the Milwaukee road Thursday afternoon near Palmyra. Both engines were badly injured, and considerable damage done to the trains. Fortunately no persons were hurt. One of the trains was running in from Madison and the other out to Janesville.
NEVADA, IN GREEN COUNTY, whose postmaster wants somebody to come there and establish "a reliable democratic paper," is a flourishing settlement of one log house in the woods, half way between Decatur and Monroe. The worthy official is doubtless ready to pledge the whole neighborhood as subscribers, provided his own paper should be thrown in for services rendered.
ROCKFORD FEMALE SEMINARY.—The anniversary exercises of this flourishing institution, were held on Thursday of last week at Rockford, in presence of a large and deeply interested audience.
A class of six young ladies graduated and received the usual diplomas. The compositions of each of the graduating class evinced scholarship and moral worth. An excellent address was delivered on the occasion by Prof. Emerson, of Beloit college. There have been in attendance during the year as pupils, two hundred and fifty-six young ladies. It is an institution of which the north-west has reason to be proud, and owes its present high position very much to the untiring labors and self-denial of its principal, Miss Sill.
Janesville, July 18th, 1854.
SUPREME COURT DECISION.—The Milwaukee papers publish the opinion of chief justice Whiton in the case of Mr. Booth. It would occupy nearly a page of our daily paper, and is pronounced by all who heard or have read it a very able argument, while many consider it incontrovertible. Of the decision of the court, the Free Democrat says:
Judge Crawford affirmed the opinion of the court so far as our discharge on defectiveness of the warrant was concerned, and also the power of the state courts to enforce the writ of habeas corpus against officers of the U. S., but sustained the constitutionality of the fugitive act.
Judge Smith gave an able verbal opinion, affirming his former opinion and reviewing some other important points.
A friend who lately visited St. Paul, Minnesota, seeking a location, says the immigration to that region is tremendous, and that property is held at almost fabulous prices, $1,000 per acre being demanded for land in the vicinity of St. Paul. Our friend concluded that it was no place for him, and returned to this section, confident that he could do better here with what money he had.—Kenosha Telegraph.
ROBBER.—The express company were robbed on the way here, of a nice package of jewelry, belonging to Mr. Singleton, of this city. The box containing it was broken open, and then pegged together with wooden pins, to prevent a noise. Mr. S. has received an instalment of new and fashionable goods, while the rascals didn't see.—Racine Advocate, 19th inst.
WHITEWATER WEEKLY GAZETTE.—This is the name of a new and neat-looking paper, published at the thriving village of Whitewater, by Waterman & Brennan.

IN ITALY.
BY RAYARD TAYLOR.
"Dear Lillian, all I wished is won!
I sit beneath Italia's sun
Where olive orchards gleam and quiver
Along the banks of Arno's river.
Through laurel leaves the dim green light
Falls on my forehead as I write;
And the sweet chiming of vesper's ringing,
Blends with the cadence of my singing.
Rich is the soil with fane's gold;
The stirring memories of old
Rise thronging in my haunted vision,
And wake my spirit's yearning ambition.
But as the radiant sunsets close
Above Val d'Arno's bowers of rose,
My soul forgets the olden glory,
And deems our love a dearer story.
Thy words in memory's ear entwine
The music of the Tuscan rhyme:
Thou stand'st here—the gentle-hearted—
Amid the shades of bardic dream.
Their garlands of immortal bay
I see before thee fade away,
And turn from Rome's passion glances
To my own dear heart-romances.
Sad is the opal glow that fires
The midnight of the cypress spires;
And the cold scented wind that closes
The hearts of bright Etruscan roses.
The fair Italian dream I chanced,
A single thought of mine to heed;
For the true clime of song and soul
Lies in the heart which mine hath won!"

SKETCHES OF BORDER-LIFE.
FLEET FOOT.—A LEGEND OF KENTUCKY.

BY WILLIAM T. COOGEWELL.

In 1778 Kentucky was the home of remarkable men. They were men who exceeded the Indian in cunning—who had more enduring powers of resistance to fatigue, and who were as relentless in pursuit of their red foes as were the savage red men in pursuit of white intruders upon the ancient hunting grounds of their tribes. There are Indian wigwags now toward the Rocky mountains, and on the plains sloping from the Sierra Nevada, and there are white men, who dare wrap themselves in their blankets and go to rest alone in the forest—who are brave and hardy and who know from severe experience the trials and fatigues of a hunter's life, but there are none who may be selected as fair representatives of the hunters of Kentucky. The fatigues, the dangers and perils of a Rocky mountain life, now-a-days, do not equal those which surrounded the pioneer from Virginia, in 1778. Among the most exciting traditions of the valley of the west, those belonging to Kentucky have pre-eminence. Pioneers had, not before, disturbed, that they must retreat from the valley or the hill-side where the white man chose to build his cabin. Bold and brave, stout and determined men alone, were fitted to carry the rifle and swing the axe in the forests to be felled, in 1778 for the cabin and the corn field. Our legend is about such men. Two of them were in the depths of a dense forest on a certain morning, when, though the earlier harbingers of dawn had given place to rosy tints, which glowed upon hill-tops touching the eastern horizon, it was so dark in the wooded valleys that the hunters with difficulty groped their way. They had not traveled all night, but they had gathered up their blankets when it was yet an hour before daybreak, and were picking their way along slowly—knowing that soon the morning light would break through the thick foliage over them. They had been absent from the fort, at Harrodsburg, several days; they knew there was anxiety about their fate and they were impatient to relieve it. It was not light enough for them to see distinctly, when their quick ears detected a foot-step stealthily approaching. In an instant each had chosen his ambush and was keenly watchful. "By power, his old Martin," cried one of the hunters, and springing from his ambush, he drew his rifle to his shoulder and leveled it at thus indicated, who gave a sudden yell, and then, in a rough tone said: "Put down your shootin' iron. I aint fond of such notions, ef they are in fun. Whar's Mac?" "Ready to pop you ef you had been a red skin," answered the individual called for, showing himself. "Well I've got a leetle news for you in particular, but it may be Fleet Foot 'll take a sort 'o notion to it too. Sit down on this 'ere log till I tell you, for it's a leetle serious and I'm kinder worked up about it." The three hunters sat together in earnest conversation until the sun shone broadly on the tree tops, and checkered shadows lay all around them on the fallen leaves. Old Martin, after reminding the others that he had gone away from the fort at Harrodsburg the day before they left, informed them that he had been working about ten miles distant, where some friends were making a settlement. Mac's sister had gone with him as company for his wife. Four men were at work in the woods, when they heard screams at the cabin. They rushed toward it. Martha's son, one of the four, was shot by an Indian, whom old Martha saw and attacked, while the others continued toward the cabin. "I put a ball in that red skin who shot Bob," said old Martin, talking to Mac and Fleet Foot, "and then I run for the cabin too. I didn't hear or see any sign of any more Indians, and when I got to the cabin I found the women were gone. I swore a leetle and cursed the Indians right smart but poor Bob was in the woods and we had to look after him. So we went, sneakin', and found him dead enough and we carried him to the cabin and then held a counsel. I swore I'd go to the fort and git a party, and foler them red skins till we had our women and their scalps ef it took till snow come. We discussed a while, and the other boys agreed to get on the Injin's trail and make signs, and I started for the fort. It was just about sundown, and soon it got dark and I was leetle excited and I got a leetle wrong, and I've been a wanderin' and just beginnin' to get the right bearings, when I saw Fleet Foot a drawin' a sight on me. I was tattered lucky."

Now, old man, you go right on straight to the fort and get five or six hunters and send 'em on after us, and we'll go right off to your cabin and afore night we'll overtake them with gins, and may-be afore you boys get up with us we'll do the business. Tell 'em at the fort that our blood is up, and the sights on our ridin' are a leetle to be drawn on them Blackfish. "That's a fact," cried Mac, "they know us and they can just calculate that we'll stretch a few of these rascals ef we got a chance, or they'll do our business for us right quick. They got one of my folks and that's as many as we mean to let 'em have—Kite shall be rescued or avenged, anyhow we'll give 'em ten to one for cutting off Harry and Bob." The hunters separated without formality; old Martin hastening with all his energy to execute his mission, and Mac and Fleet Foot struck a bee-line for the cabin. Fleet Foot had an interest in the success of the enterprise about which he did not speak. It was venturesome for two hunters to start from the cabin on the night previous, to follow, they knew not how many Indians, but they only went as spies. It was much more venturesome—much more desperate for Fleet Foot and his companion to undertake what they threatened. They went not only as spies; unless the party of Indians was very large they determined to rescue the women, if they were alive—if not to avenge their massacre terribly. Both were daring and experienced hunters. Fleet Foot was one of the bravest and shrewdest of Kentucky pioneers. He was young, but athletic, watchful and quick at expedients, besides he possessed extraordinary fleetness. No Indian could out-run him. He had had several opportunities of testing his powers as a runner in saving his own and others lives. He alluded to some of them in his conversation with old Martin. On one occasion he was chopping with his brother and another pioneer, about four miles from the fort, when a large party of Indians led by the renowned chief Blackfish, suddenly attacked them—shot Fleet Foot's brother and took the other chopper prisoner. Fleet Foot dashed through the forest at the top of his speed, with half a dozen warriors striving ever-muscle to overtake him. It was their design to attack the fort. They were eagerly anxious to prevent an alarm being given, but the young hunter was too fleet for them all. He reached the fort in safety, and the garrison prepared at once to meet their foe. When the Indians made the attack they were repelled with considerable loss. On another occasion Fleet Foot was shooting at a mark near the fort with a brother of his present companion. They were suddenly surrounded by Indians. The other marksman was shot. Balls aimed at Fleet Foot missed him. He ran with his energy toward the fort, several Indians in full chase after him—others firing at him. He was within seven paces of the fort when he saw that the door was not open. In an instant the thought struck him that it dare not be opened for fear of the Indians would rush in. He threw himself flat on the ground between a large stump and the fort. There were numerous guns aimed at the Indians from the fort, and they dare not come within range of the balls. They amused themselves by firing at Fleet Foot. There he lay, his mother looking down upon him and praying that he might be saved—his friends urging him to lie close and not lose courage—while the balls of the savage warriors, thirsting for his blood, were striking close to him, often throwing upon him the dirt which they plowed up. It was a most perilous and painful position. He conversed with his friends about opening the door of the fort. He said he could rush through it in an instant. They answered him that they dare not risk the lives of the women and children. The Indians might reach the door before it could be securely fastened again. There were not men enough in the fort to fight the large body of Indians in close combat. The balls from the rifles of the Indians continued to strike around him. A moment the young hunter was engaged in deep thought—then he cried: "For God's sake dig a hole under the fort and I'll creep through it." Immediately his request was complied with and the brave hunter reached this curious avenue to safety without injury, and was caught in his mother's arms and wept over as one rescued who had been given up as lost. The baffled Indians retired with savage yells. When Fleet Foot and his companion reached the cabin they had no difficulty in finding the "signs" made by the hunters who had followed the Indians as spies. They pushed forward on the trail with the speed which only experienced hunters could attain. It was yet early in the day when old Martin showed a party of five hunters where he had killed the Indian who shot his son Bob. This party immediately followed in pursuit of Fleet Foot and Mac. It was between mid-day and sun-down when Fleet Foot declared that the Indians could not be much in advance, and he and Mac began to calculate what they should do when the savages were overtaken. They conversed a few minutes when Fleet Foot said: "It's no use—we don't know how we'll find 'em. I'll be time to fix how we shall give it to 'em when we've got a sight of the varmints." Again the hunters pushed forward zealously. They had not yet met the two hunters who left the cabin the night previous. They began to have serious surmises about their fate. As they hastened on they frequently conversed in low tones about their fore-runners. Lengthened shadows were creeping in the forest, indicating that soon it would be impossible for the hunters to keep trace of the signs which had been left during the day. Fleet Foot observed a small piece of linen on a bush. He grasped eagerly, showing it to Mac, said: "That's leetle encouraging. It shows the women are yet alive anyhow; but it's tattered strange we haven't ketch'd them other boys. I believe they've been a leetle careless and the Injins have got 'em." He had gone but a few steps after he made these remarks when Fleet Foot cried: "Just as I expected. Here's one of 'em anyhow. Them Injins 'll roast the other, by powder, if we don't get 'em out of their hands." "That they will," answered Mac, who looked upon the dead body of a hunter, with whom he had been well acquainted, lying directly in their path. He had been shot and his scalp taken. Last year old Blackfish said he'd roast the first hunter he could get into his camp, and if they got the other fellow a prisoner, I'll bet they mean to give him a taste of what we give young pigs on Christmas, but we won't let 'em, by powder, as you say, Fleet Foot. "No by powder, we won't," cried Fleet Foot. The hunters did not stand over the body of their dead friend even long enough for this conversation. Their duties to the living were too pressing. They talked cautiously as they proceeded. Experienced as they were in detecting Indian "signs," they knew that the savages could not be far in advance, and they hoped to overtake them before it was dark. While the hunters were hastening in the pursuit under this impression, the Indians were encamped upon a small stream, in a spot which afforded no particular advantages to them in case of an attack. It was late in the afternoon when the female prisoners, from over fatigue, began to grow tardy in their march. Both left behind the main party of savages and were guarded by a brawny warrior who delighted in tormenting them. The spies on their trail came in sight of the women and this warrior, who, with an Indian boy was, at that moment, all the savages in sight, and supposing this to be the whole of the party, with a reckless impulse rushed to the attack. They saw their error too late. The brawny warrior was severely wounded by a ball from the rifle of one of the hunters but no sooner had the report of his gun rung through the woods than the hunters were surrounded. One was shot and scalped; the other taken prisoner. While Fleet Foot and his companions were groping their way by starlight, the Indians were holding a council upon the fate of their prisoners. The spies had found much difficulty in tracing the path of the Indians, but they left behind them such signs as clearly indicated to their followers, the path to be pursued. The savages had pushed forward with much speed and caution till they had been attacked; when, supposing that all in their pursuit had been removed from a watch over their movement, they relaxed their speed, and soon encamped, losing the aid of the fore-runners, from the time they left the corpse of their keenest powers, in order to keep the Indian trail. Twilight was gone, and though the hunters could clearly see the leaves on the tree-tops, it had become quite dark around their path. They were about to seek a camping place, and give over the pursuit till another day dawned, when Fleet Foot stooping forward, looked for several moments intently through the flickering gloom, then he whispered to Mac: "Somebody's makin' a little fire out yonder about a mile, and I'll bet my ammunition it's them tattered varmints." The fire grew brighter; Mac saw it distinctly. The hunters slowly and stealthily turned their footsteps toward the feeble flame. It became more distinct, until at length they could see its smoke curling among the leaves of the trees under which it snarped and glowed. A dark form stood between the fire and the hunters; they recognized the outline to be that of an Indian; creeping onward with cat-like caution, each grasped their rifles closer, and put their left hands on their hunting knives. They were impatient to know where the prisoners were and what was the strength of the Indian party. At length the fire blazed so brightly that it illuminated three forms which the hunters, with great joy, recognized as those of the women and the captured spy; but with all their skill and all their caution the hunters could not ascertain the number of savages. An old Indian came to the fire and lit his pipe; another roasted a piece of meat, and both joined a party at such a distance from the fire that Fleet Foot was puzzled to tell how many foes he must fight before the prisoners could be rescued. He longed to shoot the "varmints," who exposed themselves at the fire, but prudence forbade him. He instructed Mac to keep his place and watch closely while he went round the camp and reconnoitered. Watchfully and noiselessly he stole through the woods, till the Indian council was between him and the fire; then he could count the number of Indians in council, but he was not satisfied to know only what strength guarded the prisoners; he desired to communicate to them the cheering news that they had friends as well as foes around them. With this intention he continued his noiseless course until he stood within a few feet of the prisoners. The young woman was nearest him. He whispered her name. She did not hear him, or if she heard, conceived the voice to be one of her active imagination had conjured. Again Fleet Foot whispered that name which was dear to him, and fell sweetly from his lips. The young woman started and looked about her. An Indian on the watch, saw her startled movement, and came near her. The fire shone brightly on him; Fleet Foot was sorely tempted to shoot him, but the risk was too great. The bold hunter's portion was one of great trial. Another word from him might alarm the young woman, and her agitation defeat the whole scheme of rescue. Shielded from the view of the Indians by a large tree, Fleet Foot crept nearer the prisoners. He was rejoiced to see the Indian whose suspicious had been excited, return among his companions and take his seat in the council. Fleet Foot was now within a few feet of the prisoners—he saw them as distinctly as if it were daylight, and he could see, seated upon the ground not many yards beyond the prisoners, a little body of desperate savages, apparently consulting about the fate of the three pale faces, towards whom, more than one Indian eye was continually cast. Again Fleet Foot whispered. To his great joy he saw that the young woman heard and recognized a friendly voice, but having been warned by the conduct of the savage watching her, was shrewd enough to make no movement that would again rouse his suspicions. She dare not answer the voice, and Fleet Foot was left to conjecture whether she knew if it was he so near her—he would have run many risks to have known how wildly her heart beat, for it told her that he who was risking so much for her sake could be none other than Fleet Foot. The hunter was determined not to be in doubt as to whether she knew him, and he whispered: "I am Fleet Foot and Mac's not far off; and old Martin's comin' with a party of sharpshooters, and afore morning we'll give them varmints what'll keep 'em from killin' any more white folks, or stealin' any more women. When you get a chance, whisper to the old woman, and tell her not to go to sleep, and tell that chap tied up near her to be on the look out for a fight." The young woman dropped her head as if it had fallen upon her breast with a nod in sleep, and Fleet Foot understood that his message and warning were distinctly known. To be concluded.

CHEAPER PAPER.—ANOTHER INTENTION.—The Long Island Vindicator of last week says: Mr. Samuel Nolan, late of the city of Dublin, Ireland, now resident in New York, with the assistance of his brother-in-law, Dr. Antisel, has invented and patented a paper making machine and pulp that meets all the difficulty. Dr. Antisel, whose chemical knowledge is so universally known and prized, has invented a pulp, which in its raw state will not cost more than about four cents per lb., and by the aid of the machine invented by Mr. Nolan, can be brought into market, made into paper, at a cost of about four cents per lb. Paper at present costs about sixteen cents, so that the value of the invention can at once be seen. The material from which the pulp is manufactured will flourish and grow abundantly in ground that is at present useless to the farmer, and here, too, the community will be the gainers. We have seen and examined specimens of the pulp, and have seen in position its pronounced it just the thing wanted. It is as white and clear as the most clearly bleached cotton, and is capable of the most delicate tint. The bareness and transparency of the straw paper is not to be found on it, while it is capable of the highest finish, maintaining all the pliancy and toughness of pure linen rags. In connection with this subject we will say more in a few days, and by a few simple calculations endeavor to show that Messrs. Nolan and Antisel are real benefactors to their race. We hope they will reap the rich reward such mastery of mind over matter deserves.

SATURDAY MORNING, JULY 22, 1854.

MR. BOOTH AGAIN ARRESTED.—Mr. Booth was arrested and imprisoned day before yesterday on a bench warrant from the U. S. district court, to answer to the indictment found against him in that court. A statement made by Mr. Booth as to a refusal by Judge Miller to accept Dr. Wunderly as his bail is contradicted in some particulars by the clerk of the court, a son of Judge Miller. Mr. Payne, counsel for Mr. Booth, left Milwaukee in the evening, to make application to the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus.

The storms of Wednesday and Thursday nights were very severe, and it is likely, have done a vast amount of injury to the crops.—Wheat is beaten down badly, and the labor of harvesting it will be greatly increased, if indeed it is not in many instances rendered worthless. Oats are still worse. They are so badly tangled and twisted about as to make it next to impossible to cut them. Whether the corn has been injured we are not advised, but it hardly seems as though it could stand well against such heavy wind. Thus the prospect which but a short time ago was so very cheering, is suddenly changed. A few days of fair weather may bring about a better look, but it is now far enough from encouraging.

We understand that the locusts have done much more damage in the vicinity of Rockford than in this section. They puncture small limbs of trees for the purpose of depositing their eggs; every such limb dies and falls to the ground. Young orchards are seriously injured, some possibly ruined, and the foliage upon forest trees, particularly the oak presents the appearance of having been injured by the fire. Many stories are in circulation of the poisonous effects of their bite upon the human system, producing in some instances death. Of their truth we were not able to learn. Several families that resided at Rockford seventeen years ago, speak of their appearance that season in greater numbers than this. Hoping they may not make their appearance again, we commit their history and destiny to the naturalist.

NEW FLOUR.—Trusdell has for sale at his mill flour from new winter wheat.

RAILROAD COLLISION.—Two freight trains came into collision on the Milwaukee road Thursday afternoon near Palmyra. Both engines were badly injured, and considerable damage done to the trains. Fortunately no persons were hurt. One of the trains was running from Madison and the other out to Janesville.

Nevada, in Green county, whose postmaster wants somebody to come there and establish "a reliable democratic paper," is a flourishing settlement of one log house in the woods, half way between Deatur and Mourea. The worthy official is doubtless ready to pledge the whole neighborhood as subscribers, provided his own paper should be thrown in for services rendered.

ROCKFORD FEMALE SEMINARY.—The anniversary exercises of this flourishing institution, were held on Thursday of last week at Rockford, in presence of a large and deeply interested audience. A class of six young ladies graduated and received the usual diplomas. The compositions of each of the graduating class evinced scholarship and moral worth. An excellent address was delivered on the occasion by Prof. Emerson, of Beloit college. There have been in attendance during the year as pupils, two hundred and fifty-six young ladies. It is an institution of which the north-west has reason to be proud, and owes its present high position very much to the untiring labors and self-denial of its principal, Miss Sill.

Janesville, July 18th, 1854.

SUPREME COURT DECISION.—The Milwaukee papers publish the opinion of chief justice Whitton in the case of Mr. Booth. It would occupy nearly a page of our daily paper, and is pronounced by all who heard or have read it a very able argument, while many consider it incontrovertible. Of the decision of the court, the Free Democrat says: Judge Crawford affirmed the opinion of the court so far as our discharge on defectiveness of the warrant was concerned, and also the power of the state courts to enforce the writ of habeas corpus against officers of the U. S., but sustained the constitutionality of the fugitive act. Judge Smith gave an able verbal opinion, affirming his former opinion and reviewing some other important points. A friend who lately visited St. Paul, Minnesota, seeking a location, says the immigration to that region is tremendous, and that property is held at almost fabulous prices, $1,000 per acre being demanded for land in the vicinity of St. Paul. Our friend concluded that it was no place for him, and returned to this section, confident that he could do better here with what money he had.—Kenosha Telegraph.

ROBBER.—The express company were robbed on the way here, of a nice package of jewelry, belonging to Mr. Singleton, of this city. The box containing it was broken open, and the jewelry together with wooden pins, to prevent a noise. Mr. S. has received an instalment of new and fashionable goods, which the rascals didn't see.—Racine Advocate, 10th inst.

WHITEWATER WEEKLY GAZETTE.—This is the name of a new and neat-looking paper, published at the thriving village of Whitewater, by Waterman & Brenau.
